With hundreds of followers, the person says things such as, "White Power," and, "I hate Jew." The grim reality is that many of the racist's followers believe every word he said. A new BBC and Economist Study confirms that most followers of far-right extremists are even more racist than the extremists themselves. The study has revealed that the number of followers on the extremist groups Facebook and Twitter is ten times that of normal users and is comparable to users of 'alt-right' message boards. "Our research shows that the extremist user and their followers are almost completely engaged with each other and that their online presence and interactions are almost indistinguishable from those of the more mainstream groups," says study author Myra Duckworth. The study also found that far-right extremists' language is homogenised. "Using extremists' language, shared memes and hashtags, we identified the themes that emerge in their interactions," Duckworth said. "Themes appeared to be 'rhetoric of victimisation' – focusing on a grievance or injustice. Another major theme was the use of 'discourse of restoration' – focusing on denigrating or rehabilitating a group, nation or other people." Even everyday English that "every normal person can understand" was found in the language of the far-right. "One example is the use of 'racist' as a slur for an individual, compared to the use of 'racist' as an adjective meaning biased, prejudiced or insulting," Duckworth added. The study
